In 1992, the American Bar Association's (ABA) Standing Committee on Legal Education and Admission to the Bar (SCLERA) issued a report titled "The American Bar Association's Response to the Crisis in Legal Education." The report was a landmark document in the history of legal education, as it was the first time that the ABA had issued a report on the crisis in legal education. The report identified a number of problems with the legal education system, including the high cost of law school, the low quality of legal education, and the high unemployment rate for law school graduates. The report also identified a number of solutions to these problems, including the need for a new model of legal education, the need for a new system of accreditation, and the need for a new system of admission to the bar.
